MENTORING NEEDS TRUST

The key to creating effective mentoring relationships lies in the development of trust between two strangers of different ages:

- Without establishing trust, mentors can never truly support the Little
- Learning to trust, especially for youth who have been let down before, requires time
- Youth cannot be expected to trust their mentor simply because the staff has matched them together
- Mentors who focus first on building trust and becoming a friend to their youth tend to be more effective than those who immediately try to change or reform the mentee

Effective mentors are more likely to engage in the following practices:

- They make a commitment to being consistent and dependable, to maintaining a steady presence in the mentee's life. They recognize that the relationship may be fairly one-sided and take responsibility for keeping the relationship alive. They acknowledge that youth often test adults to determine whether they will actually stick around; successful mentors regularly initiated contact and ensured that meetings were scheduled, rather than waiting to hear from the youth. Other research found that successful mentors exhibit an attitude of caring.
- They involve the youth in deciding how the pair will spend time together. Although youth are often somewhat uncommunicative, successful mentors take the time to learn about the youth's interests and provide them with options for how to spend their time, rather than planning everything without input from the youth. It is important to remember that, similar to adults, children's moods and energy levels differ each day. Therefore, it is helpful to be flexible about the plans you may have made.
- They pay attention to kids' need for "fun." Not only is having fun a key part of building a relationship, but it provides youth with valuable opportunities that are often not available otherwise. Children can learn a lot when doing fun activities.
- They respect the mentee's viewpoint. Effective mentors are open and flexible; they listen to what the child has to say and pay attention to what the child thinks is important.
- They get to know their mentee's families and communicate regularly with them. Successful mentors have found it helpful to build a relationship of openness and mutual respect with their mentee's family. The family knows their child well and can offer helpful suggestions and support.
- They focus on the mentee's strengths, ensuring that the youth experiences success and a sense of self mastery. It is better to build from a strength rather than a weakness.
- Finally, successful mentors seek and use available resources such as the support and guidance of staff. These mentors recognize that it can be helpful to talk with staff, especially when they are struggling with issues arising from the match. It is normal for most mentors to experience some frustration, especially in the early stages of the relationship. Help and advice from program staff can benefit mentors (and consequently mentees) tremendously.

Adults who become effective mentors often see themselves as "friends" rather than teachers or parents and define their role as supporting the youth in a variety of ways.

- A mentor is caring, steady, patient, realistic, resourceful, respectful and resilient.
- Building trust and establishing a friendship are the key goals.
